Thinking Interdependently

People who think interdependently:

• are willing to accept information from others, even if it’s not always positive
• listen to others
• are willing to give up their idea if another idea seems better
• know how to help the group succeed
• have empathy for others
• are willing to go along with the group’s decision, even if not in full agreement
• are willing to learn from others

Open to Continuous Learning

People who are open to continuous learning:

• are open to new experiences
• are willing to admit when s/he doesn’t know something
• welcome new information on all subjects
• see problems and situations as opportunities to learn
• strive to improve
• develop capabilities for effective, thoughtful action
• inquire, doubt and explore
